Courage at half cock

IT MUST BE obvious to readers that Courage is not the 'Drinker's' favourite brewery. It is fast taking over the mantle once worn by Watney's, that of the beer enthusiast's Enemy No. 1.

Why should this be so? When you venture into a Courage pub these days, (writes NICK WARD, who is CAMRA's liaison officer with the company), you need to have your beer buds about you. You might, if you're lucky, get a pint of Directors or Best Bitter, still quite good beers, though sometimes hard to tell apart. On the other hand, you might be served 'bright' (i.e. filtered) best bitter from a handpump, prevalent in South-East London, Surrey and Kent. You might be palmed off with a pint of top-pressure Directors.

Both practices are against declared company policy, but the company doesn't seem to have much to say about what goes on in its pubs. To be fair to Courage landlords, the main problem they face with regard to real ale is delivery. Some landlords serving bright best through handpumps do so because they can't get the real thing. Others, particularly in S.W. London (see June 'London Drinker') are being persuaded to take bright beer by the local depot.

Courage's management policies seem to be at the root of the problem. Centralised brewing and distribution through depots favour processed beer, since the double-handling and delays involved are likely to affect the quality of cask-conditioned ale, especially when disputes cause additional hold-ups.

The other big brewers, including Watney's, have realised the commercial importance of real ale, but Courage just haven't caught on.

They show no signs of realising the benefits of decentralisation and the identity of regional brews.

Courage in London have a good strong bitter (Directors), and a bitter which could be improved, although a new barrel of Best Bitter can be very good. But they have no real mild. Within the group they have the ability to produce really good mild, (witness Plymouth Heavy and the excellent, late-lamented Reading Mild). But they have abandoned this end of the drinkers' market in favour of the mad scramble for the lager bubble.

So we have a company which is following the policies of Watney's in the Sixties and their profit performance has gone the same way - down. CAMRA is trying to help them see the light, but the management, at least in London, won't even talk to us. So all we can do is monitor their headlong progress to Grotneyland.

Courage are not as single-minded as Watney's were in pursuing their fate. They are still installing handpumps-1400 are promised in the next year. More promotion is planned for Directors and Best Bitter, and the Courage Western 'Ale House Scheme' whereby leaflets are available giving all outlets for cask-conditioned beer is being actively pursued.

Therefore if we can correct the, largely local, attempts to push pressurised and bright beer and assist any attempts to promote real ale, Courage is not a lost cause.

We can only hope that Courage recognise the full potential of real ale before Imperial Tobacco, who own them, decide to sell them off to Wimpy Bars or to a Pizza chain.

Please send any information on bright beer through handpumps or Directors on top-pressure to me at 15, Darwin Court, Balaam Street, E.1?
